

MONEY

ENTREPRENEUR

Clampdown on migrant staff

Small businesses are being hit hard by the government's clampdown on migrant staff. The new rules mean that many small businesses are struggling to find staff, and some are being forced to close their doors. The government has introduced a new system of visas for migrant workers, which means that businesses can no longer rely on cheap labor from overseas. This has led to a shortage of staff in many sectors, particularly in the construction and manufacturing industries. Small businesses are particularly affected, as they often have a high proportion of migrant staff. Many of these businesses are struggling to pay the higher wages that are required to attract local staff. Some are being forced to close their doors, while others are being forced to reduce their production. The government has introduced a new system of visas for migrant workers, which means that businesses can no longer rely on cheap labor from overseas. This has led to a shortage of staff in many sectors, particularly in the construction and manufacturing industries. Small businesses are particularly affected, as they often have a high proportion of migrant staff. Many of these businesses are struggling to pay the higher wages that are required to attract local staff. Some are being forced to close their doors, while others are being forced to reduce their production.

The government has introduced a new system of visas for migrant workers, which means that businesses can no longer rely on cheap labor from overseas. This has led to a shortage of staff in many sectors, particularly in the construction and manufacturing industries. Small businesses are particularly affected, as they often have a high proportion of migrant staff. Many of these businesses are struggling to pay the higher wages that are required to attract local staff. Some are being forced to close their doors, while others are being forced to reduce their production.

The government has introduced a new system of visas for migrant workers, which means that businesses can no longer rely on cheap labor from overseas. This has led to a shortage of staff in many sectors, particularly in the construction and manufacturing industries. Small businesses are particularly affected, as they often have a high proportion of migrant staff. Many of these businesses are struggling to pay the higher wages that are required to attract local staff. Some are being forced to close their doors, while others are being forced to reduce their production.